This best-selling guide to decluttering your home from minimalist visionary Jennifer Nicole takes readers step-by-step through her revolutionary “Tao of Cleanliness” System for simplifying, organizing, and storing. This system will teach you the fine art of decluttering Japanese style.

Clutter is a physical manifestation of the stress in our lives. Every time we look at it, we feel like a failure. It's a constant reminder of our own inadequacy. A cluttered room or a disorganized desktop....it can often be a sign of something inside of us. A form of mental clutter.

What we want is a sound mind in a sound body.

That's ancient Latin aphorism is so right. When our house is cluttered, our mind is cluttered. And it can feel like we are trapped in a continuous cycle.

By tackling the physical clutter problem first, you open the door to breaking that cycle and freeing your mind from that sense of failure or looming stress.

If you declutter your house, you can declutter your life.

Nobody actually wants to live in a messy home or have routines and habits that hurt our relationships with loved ones. Living this way can make us feel empty and isolated. We end up filling our house with junk to make up for the emptiness in our hearts.

Without realizing it, you could be stuck in this emotionally draining, disorganized cycle right now.
